

ELSEWHERE

A Journal of Place

Like Home
July 05, 2018

LETTER FROM ELSEWHERE
For our monthly round-up of all our articles, interviews and other features:

SIGN UP FOR THE ELSEWHERE NEWSLETTER

CATEGORIES:

Words

Interview

Books

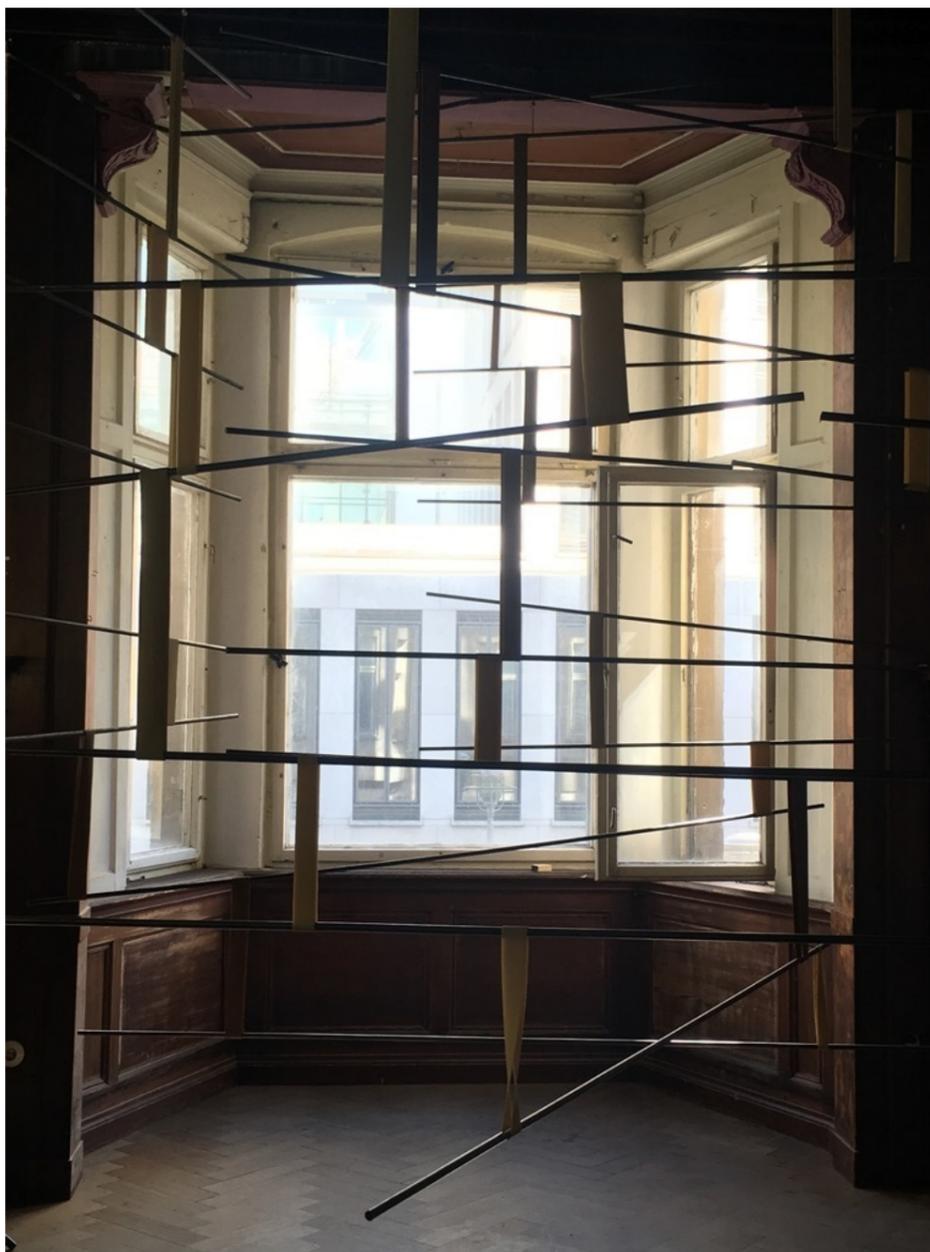

Art

Music & Film

What's On

In our home town of Berlin, Catherine Marshall visits an exhibition that explores notions of place and home through the work of different artists:

In a grand corner apartment block in Berlin's Mitte near Friedrichstraße, eleven artists with a connection to South America and Berlin have set up temporary home, or 'Like Home' as the exhibition is titled. It is organised by the project Loop Raum, and the focus of the work is on abstraction, patterning, repetition and colour. Visiting it transported me back to the time of abundant unrenovated spaces in Berlin, where you might come across pop-up exhibitions in unusual places and have the pleasure of discovering the unexpected. Stepping into the the first-floor apartment where the exhibition is held, the space exudes the former grandeur of its Gründerzeit architecture with its high ceilings, intricate stucco and beautiful parquet flooring. At the same time, the rooms are damp and cold in places, the corridors are quite spooky and maze-like and plaster lies exposed with remnants of wallpaper from bygone years. We start to explore.

CARLA GUAGLIARDI / "O LUGAR DO AR" (THE PLACE OF AIR)

In the first room, we see a delicate kinetic sculpture of iron rods supported by

COMPLETE ARCHIVE:

- January 2020
- December 2019
- November 2019
- October 2019
- September 2019
- August 2019
- July 2019
- June 2019
- May 2019
- April 2019
- December 2018
- November 2018
- October 2018
- September 2018
- August 2018
- July 2018
- June 2018
- May 2018
- April 2018
- March 2018
- February 2018
- January 2018
- December 2017
- November 2017
- October 2017
- September 2017
- August 2017
- July 2017
- June 2017
- May 2017
- April 2017
- March 2017
- February 2017
- January 2017
- December 2016
- November 2016
- October 2016
- September 2016
- August 2016
- July 2016
- June 2016
- May 2016
- April 2016
- March 2016
- February 2016
- January 2016
- December 2015
- November 2015
- October 2015
- September 2015
- August 2015
- July 2015
- June 2015
- May 2015
- April 2015
- March 2015
- February 2015
- January 2015
- December 2014
- October 2014

shape. It's material and formal abstraction is incongruous to the historicist style of the room, yet it reinvents it. It is not solid and fixed, yet it has a strong presence. When we endeavour to make a new city feel like home, we wish to carve out a space for ourselves, both physically and mentally. Due to economic necessity, a transient way of life can also become a permanent state.

We turn the corner down a long corridor where a small drawing by Columbian artist Carlos Silva from his 'Mazy Drawing' series hangs. Its overlapping squares of blue ink appear to have been made with a scraping technique. The wall it hangs on carries its own marks: Swathes of white filler on plywood and torn wallpaper edges. The work draws attention to the layers of workmanship and materials of the flat itself. In this show, many of the artworks resonate with the apartment itself, its ghosts and history, making us question who might have lived here. It reminds us also that home is never static, is not just located in place but also in time.

CARLOS SILVA / "MAZY DRAWING II"

Leaving the corridor, Chilean artist Gonzalo Reyes Araos' grid-like "RGB Painting" revels in glitches that might appear on a computer screen, except that this is reproduced here meticulously in paint. It's as if the romantic landscape genre of the eighteenth century practiced by artists such as Caneletto has been updated. Instead of architectural ruins we have crumbling technology. Have we passed the threshold where our home screens feel more like home than our actual home?

Other works in the show play with optical illusion, geometric forms and seem to want to reach beyond the boundaries possible between four walls or even within the limits of their own frames. Carla Bertone's colourful painting 'Turgoxid' looks as if origami paper has been folded and refolded in a quest to reach the limits imposed by the square, if there are any. Maria Muroz's "Lemniscata" is a play on the mathematical symbol of an infinity loop. Close up, however the progression of colour through the figure of eight is not so straightforward. New angles and colours become apparent, questioning our own logic.

When you move city or country or live between places then perhaps there is 'no place like home'. Instead it is something better, a plurality of homes, Kansas' origin. We prefer the uncertainty of Oz, and its new possibilities. In 'Like Home' I felt these artists might enjoy that notion too.

The exhibition 'Like Home' has been extended to July 21 and has been expanded to include an additional fifteen more artists. It can be seen at GLINT, Glinkastraße 17, 10117. The show was originally paired with another project called 'No Place' with the joint title 'No place/ Like Home'

Art

4 Likes

Share

Catherine Marshall, Exhibition, Event, Berlin, South America, Loop Raum, Carla Guagliardi, Carlos Silva, Carla Bertone, Maria Muroz, Home, Gonzalo Reyes Araos

POSTCARD FROM... SZENT MIHÁLY, BALATON

FROM TRAVAIL TO TRAVEL

Imprint Contact About

